Q & A facts about filming in Japan

Is it easy to film on location in Japan?

There are many wonderful locations in Japan to shoot a film, however, for foreign film makers to bring their production, it is a complex process. In order to film in a public space, permission must be granted by the local city office. This bureaucracy might deter some film companies from bringing their production to Japan. The Japan Film Commission was established in April 2009 in order to help bridge the gap for both foreign film production companies as well local Japanese government. We can help explain all the ordinances that would need to adhere to in order to make your production as successful as possible for your stay in Japan. We can also help with finding the best staff, equipment, delivery, and catering for your production.

Is it expensive to bring a production to Japan?

Although Japan may be considered to quite expensive compared to the rest of the world, this is a common misconception. The value of the Japanese Yen is comparable to the United States Dollar and the European Union's Euro. In terms of employing /contracting with Japanese, unions are not common of in Japan, so it may be a competitive advantage for a production company to hire Japanese actors and actresses at an affordable rate. The Japanese work ethic is one of the best in the world and Japanese crew will literally work day and night to make sure that your production will run on schedule. Japanese work by salary, not by hours spent, so your production company will not have to pay for overtime to finish the job. See the back page to learn more about the Japanese work ethic.

How is catering like in Japan?

Japan has a variety of foods to choose from. One of the most convenient catered foods are known as "bento" or lunch boxes. There are many styles and flavors to choose from and we can help you place orders at your request.
